Two-thirds (66%) of healthcare professionals would like more training focused on people with a learning disability.

Almost half (45%) of healthcare professionals think that a lack of training on learning disability might be contributing to the avoidable deaths of people with a learning disability.

Almost half (47%) of hospitals do not include information on learning disability in their induction training for clinical staff.

Survey of 500 people with a learning disability revealed³

Over a third (37%) of healthcare professionals think quality of healthcare received by people with a learning disability is worse than that received by people without a learning disability.

Almost a quarter (23%) of healthcare professionals have never attended training on meeting the needs of people with a learning disability.

59% of healthcare professionals think the issue of avoidable deaths does not receive enough attention from the NHS.

75% of people with a learning disability said their experience of going to the hospital would be improved if staff explained things in a way that was easy to understand.

Over 1 in 5 (21%) of people with a learning disability think that healthcare staff are bad at explaining things to them when they are at the hospital.

59% of healthcare professionals think that a lack of training on learning disability might be contributing to the avoidable deaths of people with a learning disability.

Almost half (45%) of healthcare professionals think that a lack of training on learning disability might be contributing to the avoidable deaths of people with a learning disability.

Almost half (47%) of hospitals do not include information on learning disability in their induction training for clinical staff.

Survey of 500 people with a learning disability revealed³

Over a third (37%) of healthcare professionals think quality of healthcare received by people with a learning disability is worse than that received by people without a learning disability.

Almost a quarter (23%) of healthcare professionals have never attended training on meeting the needs of people with a learning disability.

59% of healthcare professionals think the issue of avoidable deaths does not receive enough attention from the NHS.

75% of people with a learning disability said their experience of going to the hospital would be improved if staff explained things in a way that was easy to understand.

Over 1 in 5 (21%) of people with a learning disability think that healthcare staff are bad at explaining things to them when they are at the hospital.

59% of healthcare professionals think the issue of avoidable deaths does not receive enough attention from the NHS.